

Registering for Indiana's Telephone Privacy program was one of the best things I've done for my family's peace of mind. Any attempt to weaken that program by big banks, credit card agencies, and others that I do business with will meet stiff resistance from me as a consumer and citizen. When I want to contact my bank or credit card agency, I have to climb through a telephone tree that rivals the mighty Redwoods to get answers to simple questions. Why should I want those I do business with to contact me with NO buffers in place? I'd challenge the FCC to try to ring up the presidents of these petitioning banks to see how many you could get on the line in short order, then mention that the FCC is calling because you believe there is an "established business relationship" that gives you the right to call them at home anytime. See how that sits!
